Not illustrated. 1908 Excerpt: . . . love with you! and she had no relief from that one bewildered sentence, beating its wings through her brain. Some time later a maid brought lamps, and with the coming of the light, when the room took on its old familiar friendliness, Sissy felt more herself. Lucy, without saying anything further, went to dress for dinner. Left alone in the warmth and comfort Cecilia threw out her arms in a gesture to embrace the goodness of home. Dear place, she whispered. Her mother entered and found her smiling vaguely at her fathers picture, which hung over the fireplace. It is nearly dinner-time, my child, said the older woman affectionately. Cecilia pulled her close to her breast and held her tight. Mam, she cried, Mam, dont let me go away from you. Let me stay always. Her mother kissed her. Of course you shall stay--always, my little girl, my little, big girl. They stood together in silence, both wonderfully, newly aware of their close spiritual contact and their love of each other. Lucile, coming back for some forgotten thing, saw them thus. She hesitated on the threshold, but they did not see her. In a swift flood of loneliness that forced angry tears to her eyes and overwhelmed her with a knowledge of how apart she was from their life, she stole up-stairs again. XVII WHILE Cecilia Wrenn gazed out of her window on the grey melancholy of the evening, OHara was striding along the hillpaths towards...
