Not illustrated. 1864 Excerpt: .and he will feel the power of his right arm increase with every cubic inch of air which he inhales, till it attains its maximum, when the inspiration is completed. In the left arm, again, he will perceive little change, so that the disparity between the two arms is increased by inspiration. Or, again, let any one, when the power of his right arm is at its maximum, blow out his breath, and the power will gradually dwindle down to the standard of the left arm. As to the sensation by which we become conscious of the increasing or diminishing power of the right arm in the preceding experiments, it is manifestly of the same class as those intrinsic sensations which serve These words are to be understood as addressed to the medical students of the University, before whom this paper was first read. to indicate to us certain conditions of our internal organs--as a hungry stomach, a parched mouth, or a distended bladder. It is most closely allied to those sensations which indicate to us the conditions of the muscular system; but it is not identical with what has been called the muscular sense, for it merely gives to us consciousness of possessing strength, and not of actually putting it forth, of which the muscular sense is the measure. 3. There is less inequality between the two sides of the body in women than in men, which is owing partly to the strictly symmetrical arrangement...
