Chairs R. and L. of table. Newspaper and letters on the table. Dunnbrowne. (without) Well, good morning, my dears, (shows himself in the doorway R.)Don t be away all the morning, and do be merciful in your purchases. (enters R.) Happy is the man who is not troubled with a trio of beautiful daughters, who are incessantly going out shopping. My daughters seem to take a delight in spending my money. I suppose they act upon the principle that, if a thing is worth doing at all it is worth doing well, and as shopping is their chief and only occupation, they strive, and I may add, succeed, to do it as well as any young ladies in this mundane sphere possibly could, (sits R.)I find it of no use whatever to expostulate with them about what I consider their extravagance in dress, for they argue that as they do all the buying and I do all the paying, it is nothing but a right and proper division of labor. Now let me see what trouble has come to me through that prodigious engine of commerce, the post office, this morning. (opens a letter) Another bill from Messrs. Newshape and Whitestraw, the milliners! It is only two weeks since I paid them $25 (looks at the bill) - $37.50 for millinery! Enough to provide me with hats for twenty years, (opens another letter) More bills! This is Mrs. Goodfit s bill for dressmaking: forty dollars, (throws the bill on the table) Oh, this...
