Not illustrated. 1897 Excerpt: .there was not the slightest evidence of odor, but the tooth continued painful. Treatment was continued for three weeks, and the tooth was then extracted. Upon examination I found a little depression on the root of the tooth where a sac was located tightly adherent to the tooth. I recognized in it a distinct form of alveolar abscess that had no connection with the pulp-canal of the tooth. The matter passed from my mind until, having a number of cases, I classed them as a distinct form of abscess. Subsequently other cases came into view, and the peculiar diagnostic symptoms of almost continued but not severe pain, little inflammation, no swelling, no odor, and no results from treatment led to the aggregation and classification of the facts set forth in the paper. A third and most interesting case was that of a medical gentleman who presented...
